Report of Research:

4. Clinical impact of aortic valve prosthesis performance
5. Homograft valve modification

Narrative Description of Research:

Transgenic Pig-to-Primate Xenotransplantation

The focus of research in my laboratory is the mechanism of graft failure in pig-to primate cardiac xenotransplantation. We are involved in a collaborative effort to employ molecular and immunologic strategies to develop porcine hearts into acceptable human heart replacements. Wild type pig hearts are routinely rejected in humans and higher primates by a process of antibody-directed complement activation which involves rapid microvascular thrombosis, resulting in graft loss within minutes. The target of natural occurring primate xenoreactive antibody is the porcine endothelial antigen gal ((1,3) galactose. In collaboration with Nextran, Inc., we have obtained several lines of transgenic pigs bearing human complement regulatory proteins (CRP) such as decay-accelerating factor (DAF, D55), membrane cofactor protein (MCP, CD46), and complement inhibitor (CD59). Transgenic human CRP better attenuate the primate complement cascade resulting in extended porcine graft survival from minutes to several days. Nevertheless, transgenic porcine grafts invariably fail due to an unclear mechanism. We are currently examining the role of nitric oxide in delayed xenograft rejection.

Cardiac Valve Immunology

Recently we described the lack of expression of blood group carbohydrate antigens on porcine (Gal) and human (ABH) cardiac valve endothelium. We are now pursuing this further in both the porcine and human system. In the porcine primate heart transplant model cardiac valves do not undergo rejection and we are now developing a research plan to explore the use of fresh porcine valves (i.e. unfixed) as a valve replacement alternative. In the human model we are planning to examine serial differences in ABH expression along the arterial tree, and would like to clarify the relevance of lack of ABH expression to homograft valve degeneration.

Mechanical Coronary Anastomoses

Successful anastomotic coupling without the need for sutures would greatly facilitate beating heart coronary bypass procedures. We are investigating a new anastomotic concept with Ventrica Inc. to create sutureless side-to-side distal bypass anastomoses by magnetic coupling. We have applied this technique successfully in a beating heart coronary bypass porcine model with documented six-month angiographic patency.

Clinical impact of aortic valve prosthesis performance

Stentless bioprosthetic aortic valves offer lower gradients versus stented aortic valves. I am the principal investigator of a multi-institutional study randomizing St. Jude porcine stentless valves and Carpentier Edwards pericardial stented valves in the aortic position to further clarify the impact of aortic valve prosthetic hemodynamic performance on short and long term clinical outcomes. 200 patients are being randomized in five centers and followed prospectively for a total of 5 years.

Homograft Valve Modification

One of the obstacles to homograft valve implantation is the lack of a conventional sewing ring which is provided on all other available aortic prostheses. I filed a patent which was recently awarded over 40 claims and am now pursuing a collaborative relationship to develop a new generation of aortic homografts modified to include a sewing ring prior to cryopreservation.
